(A) DOUBLE MEANING FILE -- In view of the increasing frequency with which they are encountered and the paramount importance of the role played by double meaning communications in Communist and Soviet Espionage investigations, it is desired to point out that there is presently maintained in the Cryptanalysis Section of the Laboratory a file of double meaning words, phrases, cover names, etc., which may be of assistance to the field in the following ways: ~~X~~

1. [redacted] such communications [redacted] through their use of similar double meaning phraseology which betrays their common origin. ~~X~~
2. Comparison of current material with previously received and authenticated material in the file may be very helpful in the correlation and evaluation of such cases. ~~X~~
3. The true meanings of vague or equivocal expressions recurring in double meaning correspondence may be determined by a check against the file, thus conducing to a more accurate interpretation of the communication as a whole. ~~X~~

Set out below are examples of certain statements made by individuals in the United States strongly suspected as having Soviet espionage connections which, it is believed, possibly have double meaning or open code connotations.

It was ascertained from a highly confidential and delicate source of unimpeachable reliability that on September 26, 1945, [redacted]

[redacted] and [redacted] at that time contacted [redacted]

[redacted] There are strong indications that [redacted] and it is noted that he was the [redacted] contact of [redacted] known Soviet espionage agent, [redacted] In contacts with [redacted] used the alias [redacted] was switchboard operator at [redacted] and is also strongly suspected of being [redacted]

At the time of the above contact on September 26, 1945, [redacted] requested of [redacted] the name of a good tailor, stating he was preparing to return to the Soviet Union, which he subsequently did on October 10, 1945. [redacted] furnished [redacted] with the name [redacted] and with the name of [redacted] of the same address in Los Angeles. A check of the translation of this conversation clearly reflects that the Russian word for "tailor" was definitely used. although both [redacted] who appears identical with [redacted] with aliases, [redacted] are furriers rather than tailors.

From the same highly confidential and reliable source, it was ascertained that on December 18, 1946, [redacted] contacted [redacted] in Los Angeles and spoke to [redacted] Receptionist. [redacted] asked to speak to [redacted] who had gone back to the Soviet Union prior to that time and was advised that [redacted] was no longer [redacted] He then asked to speak to [redacted] and was informed that [redacted] was not in at the time. [redacted] then told [redacted] that he had material to sell to the Soviet Union, mentioning [redacted] suggested that he contact [redacted] replied "OK."

From available information it does not appear logical that either [redacted] would be engaged in tailoring for Soviet personnel. Since both are furriers by occupation and, in addition, it does not appear logical that [redacted] would have [redacted] for sale to the Soviet Union.

Rebulet August 22, 1947, requesting that inquiries be made of [redacted] to determine whether they can interpret certain statements mentioned in the Bureau's letter of reference as having possible open code or double meaning connotations.

This is to advise that the following reply has been received from Mr. [redacted]

"In our records of Soviet Espionage I have not been able to find any instances of plain language code resembling the possible examples you describe. [redacted]"

[redacted] Without knowledge of [redacted] activities, however, - for example in the employment of agents [redacted] or other forms of cover might be needed - this analogy remains pure speculation.

During the course of an interview with Else Bernaut on October 11, 1947, she referred on one occasion to [redacted] in a reference to Soviet Military Intelligence. It will be recalled that "Ludwig" was in the GPU Apparatus. It is known from [redacted] that [redacted] had the same meaning. Bernaut said that term was in usage when "Ludwig" was active and that the term [redacted] referred to [redacted] at that time as it also did [redacted] Time did not permit continued discussion of this "language". Bernaut said she would be glad to go into detail on this subject at a later date. b7D

Double Meaning file

Bernaut also furnished information of general interest in connection with the "Latvian" group activity in Soviet Intelligence. She said during "Ludwig's" time if a Soviet agent was described as a "Latvian" it was the equivalent of saying he is important and trusted, and also in the inner circles. This was due to the fact that General Berzin of the Soviet Fourth Department was a Latvian and when he came into this position, he brought with him his Latvian friends. As examples of this, she stated that Alfred Tiltin, who was a Latvian, was a highly placed agent and would even be considered as being superior to her husband, "Ludwig".

She also advised that Nicholas Dozenberg, who was active in the United States with Tiltin, was also a Latvian, and consequently was an agent of some standing. She said that Dozenberg would certainly have a great deal of valuable information. She indicated that she knew that Dozenberg had been interviewed by American authorities. Further, she stated that it was her understanding that Dozenberg had not supplied the authorities with anywhere near the amount of information of which she considered him to be capable.

With further reference to the "Latvians", Berzin, Tiltin, and Dozenberg were all in Military Intelligence; however, Bernaut indicated that the Latvians who were in the GPU were also agents of standing.
